Most analyses of art, for the purposes of advancing neuroscience and medicine, have been pursued through prisms of western practices. Join us as we explore how Dr. S. Ama Wray has been translating Africana 'bodily ways of knowing' through her autoethnographic action research in Kopeyia Village, Ghana, generating virtuosic as well as community artmaking through the social technology which she defines as Embodiology®. She is joined by an interdisciplinary and intercultural group of scientists, medical doctors, and researchers to look at how the application of this embodied wisdom is shaping human communication.

A Motor Theory of Sleep Control

Join the department of neurobiology and behavior on Tuesday, December 7th, 2021 for a James L. McGaugh Distinguished Lecture with guest speaker Yang Dan Ph.D. from the Department of Molecular & Cell Biology at the University of California, Berkeley.

Hybrid Event

Note: this event will be held virtually via Zoom and In-Person in the Herklotz Conference Room

To identify neurons involved in sleep generation, we have performed whole-brain screening for sleep active and sleep promoting neurons. Sleep is controlled by a highly distributed network spanning the forebrain, midbrain, and hindbrain, and most sleep neurons are part of the central somatic and autonomic motor circuits. The intimate association between the sleep and the two motor control networks suggests that a primary function of sleep is to promote biological processes incompatible with movement.
